The Scope of Adjudication in Cases of Pecuniary Compensation for the Harm Suffered – Comments in Light of the Resolution of the Supreme Court of 11 April 2019 (III CZP 105/18, BSN 2019, no. 4, p. 8)

Zakres orzekania w sprawach o zadośćuczynienie pieniężne za doznaną krzywdę – uwagi na tle uchwały Sądu Najwyższego z dnia 11 kwietnia 2019 r. (III CZP 105/18, BSN 2019, nr 4, s. 8)

SUMMARY

The purpose of this study is to analyze legal issues related to the scope of adjudication in cases of pecuniary compensation for the harm suffered, especially in a situation in which the party objected that the injured party contributed to the damage, and in a situation in which the claim submitted in the lawsuit was of a lower amount than the potentially “adequate compensation”. The principle of ne eat iudex ultra petita partium means that the court may decide only on what is claimed submitted by the party requesting legal protection. The scope of the requested legal protection thus sets the boundaries of the subject of the decision. At the same time, the assumption that there should be complete agreement between the subject of the proceedings and the subject of the ruling, i.e. what covers the subject of the decision, should be considered correct. As a result, it must be recognized that there are a close relationship and interdependence between limiting the court with what is claimed and the subject matter of the dispute. In determining the claim, the plaintiff thus sets the boundaries of the subject of the dispute, and limiting the court with what is claimed is tantamount to limiting the subject of the dispute.

Keywords: non-pecuniary damage; injured party’s contribution; subject of adjudication; prohibition of adjudication over a demand

INTRODUCTION

Hypothesis: The court, supporting the statement that the injured party contributed to the damage, considers the plaintiff's claim and accordingly seeks to reduce the awarded compensation; however, it is obliged to consider the limitation of the claim because of it, as indicated in the factual basis of the claim.

The purpose of this study is to analyze legal issues related to the scope of adjudication in cases of pecuniary compensation for the harm suffered, especially in a situation in which the party objected that the injured party contributed to the damage, and in a situation in which the claim submitted in the lawsuit was of a lower amount than the potentially "adequate compensation".

The reason for considering the above is the resolution of the Supreme Court of 11 April 2019, in which the Supreme Court, in response to the dubiety expressed by of the Court of Appeal in Warsaw¹, stated that "the Court, supporting the statement that the injured party contributed to the damage, considers the claim and diminishes the awarded compensation accordingly; however, simultaneously it is obliged to consider the limitation of the claim because of the same reason, as indicated in the actual basis of the claim".

The essence of the issue, therefore, concerns resolving the dilemma that arises at the intersection of the substantive law provisions (Article 446 § 4 of the Civil Code) and the procedural law provisions that indicates the need to specify the claim and providing the facts for its justification in the lawsuit (Article 187 §§ 1 and 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure) and prohibiting judgements that consider the party that was not included in the claim and ordering compensation that is more than the claimed one (Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure). When presenting the legal issue, the Court of Appeal indicated that there is a discrepancy in the case law, namely whether the court, when awarding compensation of an adequate amount under Article 362 of the Civil Code, is limited by the amount of the claim requested by the party in the lawsuit, or can independently determine the amount of compensation, which in its opinion is the appropriate amount, and subsequently reduce this amount pursuant to Article 362 of the Civil Code; the amount indicated in the claim then constitutes only the upper limit of the claim, which may be considered when deciding the case.

The District Court took a position in this case by stating that, considering the scope of Article 362 of the Civil Code, when reducing the amount of compensation due to the plaintiffs, the court is not limited by the amount requested in the claim, and therefore it can order an adequate amount of compensation, including a larger amount, as pursuant to Article 446 § 4 of the Civil Code. The rationale for the judgement contains no argument in this regard.

In judicature, on the one hand, it is assumed that making a settlement based on the assumption that the due redress is higher than the sought one does not mean awarding above what is claimed. On the other hand, courts assume that the subject of examination and settlement is determined only by the submitted claim and the factual circumstances considered for its justification; thus, the decision on reducing the compensation considering the statement of contributing to the occurrence or increase of damage may occur only in relation to the amount covered by the claim, unless the factual basis of the brought action indicates that this circumstance has already been considered.

On the basis of the above-mentioned provisions, different interpretations arise, which often, especially in the court practice, relate to the estimation of non-pecuniary damage in the form of negative psychological experiences or moral damage, which are difficult to determine and evaluate, including those related to the analysis of the facts of the case, and the degree to which the defendant and the injured party have contributed to the damage.

THE SCOPE OF THE REGULATION OF ARTICLE 362 OF THE CIVIL CODE

The provision of Article 362 of the Civil Code, which is in the general provisions of the third volume of the Civil Code on obligations, concerns the generally defined “obligation to redress damage”. Neither does it differentiate the legal basis from which this obligation arises, nor the party for whom this obligation is to be fulfilled. The decisions of the Supreme Court uniformly assume that the contribution to the damage of the directly injured party that died justifies the reduction of the benefits provided in Article 446 §§ 3 and 4 of the Civil Code, which are due to persons related to this injured party². Article 362 of the Civil Code applies to any standard causal relationship, whether direct or indirect, which is the cause of harm on the part of directly or indirectly injured party³.

In the case law of the Supreme Court, there is no doubt that the behaviour of the injured party that is a minor, who cannot be legally responsible due to their age (Article 426 of the Civil Code), may justify a reduction in the due compensation from the person liable for the damage based on the principle of risk⁴, as pursuant to Article 362 of the Civil Code.

The so-called the causal concept of contributing, which is prevailing in the case law, can be referred to any case in which the typical consequence of an act or omission of the injured party was the occurrence of damage⁵.

It is indicated that “The specific characteristic of the benefit, which is monetary compensation for the harm suffered, does not allow to apply mechanically the provision of Article 362 of the Civil Code on an adequate reduction of the amount of compensation because of the injured party’s contribution”⁶.

In the light of Article 362 of the Civil Code, the injured party’s contribution is only a condition for their moderation, once all the circumstances of the case are considered, and in particular the degree of contribution of both parties⁷.

An issue that raises doubts is the answer to the question whether the statement of the injured party’s contributing to the occurrence or increase of the damage obliges the court to reduce the due compensation.

According to one view, determining the contribution is only a necessary condition to consider the possibility of reducing compensation, but it is insufficient for its reduction because whether and to what extent the compensation should be reduced depends on the court’s decision in the course of the judicial assessment of compensation within the framework that is set out in Article 362 of the Civil Code as a result of a specific and individualized decision, that is taken in consideration of the circumstances of the given case. The decision to reduce compensation is the court's prerogative, and considering the circumstances in casu as a result of a specific and individualized assessment is its responsibility⁸.

The opposite view assumes that if it is established that the injured party contributed to the occurrence or increase of damage, the court – according to Article 362 of the Civil Code – considering the circumstances, including the degree of contribution of both parties, should reduce the compensation accordingly⁹.

The Supreme Court in the justification of the resolution, referring to the structure of the contribution, pointed out that “The extent of the due compensation (redress) is influenced by both the act and the omission of the injured party, while each time it is necessary to consider their contribution to the harm and the degree of contribution, as well as the burden and manner of violation of the applicable rules of proceedings. There must always be an adequate causal relationship between the behaviour of the injured person and the harm they suffered”. It was emphasized, referring to the current position of the judicature, that “the contribution of the injured party to the harm admittedly requires the application of Article 362 of the Civil Code, but it does not automatically preclude the reduction in compensation or the degree of such reduction”¹⁰. It was clearly stated that “in the case in which such a statement was made, the court, stating the cause, must make an individualized assessment of all circumstances in terms of the need and the extent of reduction of the due compensation”. It was accurately pointed out that “there is no equals sign between the degree of contribution and the extent of the compensation reduction; however, it cannot be ruled out that, in the specific circumstances of the case, compensation reduction will be made to the same extent as it occurred”¹¹.

THE CONCEPT OF “APPROPRIATE SUM” IN ARTICLE 445 § 1 OF THE CIVIL CODE IN RELATION TO ARTICLE 446 § 4 OF THE CIVIL CODE

The amendment to the Civil Code, made by the Act of 30 May 2008 on amending the Act – Civil Code and some other acts¹², which entered into force on 3 August 2008, changed the current classification of measures for the protection of relatives, indirectly injured parties, by a provision that establishes directly the possibility of granting compensation to the close relatives of the deceased injured party. This provision is a fulfilment of the postulates that have been formulated for a long time, indicating the need to protect injured parties in the event of the death of a close relative¹³.

A claim for monetary compensation cannot, however, be regarded as a means that will automatically be considered legitimate in any situation in which the directly injured party has died. In the case of this new regulation, the legislator uses the optional form, clearly indicating that the court “may”. The justification for granting compensation will, therefore, in any case, depend on the assessment by the court considering the circumstances. This does not mean, however, that the legislator's position may lead to arbitrariness of court decisions and unlimited freedom in awarding monetary compensation. Courts should comply with clear and, where possible, harmonized criteria for assessing similar situations¹⁴. The Supreme Court, in the rationale for its resolution, stated that "The starting point must be the constructions of substantive law that are applicable in the case". With regard to compensation and the injured party's contribution, the legislator introduced specific solutions providing courts with some decision-making freedom (so-called judicial law), which is normatively expressed by the reference to the concept of "suitability" as a judicial directive in the scope of determining the amount of compensation (Article 446 § 4 of the Civil Code) and determining the consequences of the injured party's contribution (Article 362 of the Civil Code).

¹³ The introduction of § 4 to Article 446 of the Civil Code meant a return to the regulation in Article 166 of the Code of Obligations, which states that in the event of the death of the injured party as a result of physical injury or causing a health disorder entitles the court to award an appropriate sum of monetary compensation for moral harm. This legislative introduction (“reactivation”) of this right in Article 446 § 4 of the Civil Code constituted a normative response to the demands directed by doctrine and case law referring to the legislator; this case law previously had no legal basis to award appropriate compensation for moral harm, if it was not associated with a deterioration of the material life situation, which is a necessary condition for granting adequate compensation under Article 446 § 3 of the Civil Code.

The award of redress is under independent judicial assessment, which does not mean, however, that this assessment is without restrictions. Only in exceptional cases (e.g. due to the insignificance of the harm suffered), the court may refuse to award any compensation¹⁵.

It is undoubtedly necessary to make an objective assessment of the claims and to be objective when determining criteria and awarding adequate amounts of compensation. The determination of the amount of compensation for damage (Article 446 § 4 of the Civil Code) should be made considering all circumstances¹⁶. Both the circumstances affecting the amount of compensation and the measures of their assessment must be considered individually for the specific injured party. Any comparison with other cases and an automatical reference to the evaluation of the harm done in these case will fail, even when the cases involve similar injuries and personal situations. The sums awarded as compensation in similar cases can only provide indicative guidelines, preventing in this way the formation of apparent disproportions; however, they do not constitute an additional criterion for the measure¹⁷.

Thus, it was left to the discretion of the court to decide whether in a particular case of a breach of personal rights compensation should be awarded and in what amount. The prerogative granted by law to the court in this respect does not mean that the court may decide without restrictions¹⁸. Therefore, if the statutory conditions justifying the claim for redress are met, the refusal to award it will have to be exceptional, when any particular circumstances that led to the non-material damage will be against such a decision¹⁹.

THE SUBJECT OF ADJUDICATION – ARTICLE 321 OF THE CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

According to Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court may not decide on the subject that was not indicated in the claim or grant awards that are greater than the claimed ones²⁰.

The rule governing the settlement of cases in a civil action, expressed in the aforementioned provision, means that the scope of the decision is determined by the plaintiff's claim, and therefore the decision cannot involve the subject that was not indicated in the claim (ne eat iudex ultra petita partium).

Resulting from this provision the principle of the autonomy of the will of the parties, according to which parties may freely decide on their legal situation, and the principle of availability, according to which parties may freely use their rights and assert them in court or resign from seeking legal protection, are the guiding principles of the civil action, which stems from its very essence²¹.

The prohibition of adjudication over a demand, which is a manifestation of the principles of availability and adversariality, means that the content of the judgement in both a positive and negative sense is determined by the party's claim. The court cannot impose anything other than what the plaintiff (aliud) has claimed, more than the plaintiff (super) has claimed, or on a different factual basis than the one indicated by the plaintiff²². It was correctly observed that the compatibility between the subject of the case and decision can be infringed in a reverse situation, that is when the court does not rule on the entire claim, i.e. the decision does not concern the entire subject of the claim. Indeed, it is permissible to consider a part of the claim (minus) with simultaneous rejection of the remainder of the motion²³.

In Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure there is a reference to the claim within the meaning of Article 187 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure. According to this provision, the obligatory content of each lawsuit constitutes a precisely specified claim and a reference to the factual circumstances justifying the claim²⁴. Also, in the analyzed resolution, the Supreme Court emphasized that "the limits of the dispute are thus determined not only by the content of the claim (petitum), but also by the factual basis of the action (causa petendi) that is understood as the factual circumstances that are relied upon by the plaintiff to justify the decision of the specific content. The scope of the court's decision, both in the positive and negative sense, is determined by the 'claim' within the meaning of Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which should be related to both the content of the motion for adjudication and the facts that are referred to for its justification"²⁵.

Being limited by the scope of the claim does not mean, however, that the court is absolutely limited by the wording of the claim. If the wording of the conclusion of the claim is unclear or inappropriate, the court may modify it; however, it must do so in accordance with the will of the plaintiff. The doctrine and jurisprudence agree that the plaintiff's claim may be subject, if necessary, to interpretation, which should aim to make a decision that considers the actual plaintiff's claim²⁶. In the judgement of 28 June 2007²⁷, the Supreme Court accurately indicated that being limited by the scope of a claim does not mean that the adjudicating court is absolutely limited by the very wording of the claim. If the content of the claim is formulated incorrectly, unclearly or imprecisely, the court may, and even is obliged to, modify it accordingly; however, it must be done in accordance with the plaintiff's will and within the framework of the lawsuit to express their will in the claim in an appropriate juridical form²⁸.

A different approach to this issue would be a manifestation of unjustified formalism, which would lead to a distortion of the principle expressed in Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure²⁹.

Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure thus reflects the traditional rule of adjudication, which prohibits adjudicating beyond a claim, i.e. manifesting itself in the fact that the court is limited by the scope of the claim and cannot dispose of the subject of the proceedings by determining its limits regardless of the scope of the plaintiff's claim of protection. The court cannot award more than it is claimed, that is allowing claims greater than the one requested by the plaintiff, including the situations when the circumstances of the case show that the plaintiff is entitled to a larger benefit. It cannot be ruled on a subject that was not claimed, i.e. awarding something other than the party claimed. The claim for action defines not only its subject matter but also its factual basis³⁰. A judgement granting an action based on facts, on which the plaintiff has neither based their claim in the lawsuit nor in the proceedings before the court of first instance, awards beyond the motion³¹.

Consequently, in a situation in which the facts referred to by the plaintiff indicate that they are also entitled to another claim in addition to the main claim, the court cannot rule on this claim³².

It has been indicated in the doctrine that the violation of the prohibition of Article 321 of the Code of Civil Procedure refers to two aspects: quantitative and qualitative. The former means that the court cannot decide on something more than the party claimed (plus, maius or super). Therefore, the decision concerning the quantitative level that goes beyond the given claim is excluded³³. In turn, the second aspect of prohibition does not allow the court to decide on something other than the party claimed (aliud). In both aspects, it is a prohibition that works “in two directions”, so if the court accepts the action and if it dismisses. The court cannot, therefore, grant or deny the party of something that is more or anything that is other than that the one that is claimed. In addition, it is pointed out that limiting the court by the scope of the claim means that the court cannot rule on anything that was not claimed³⁴.

The provision of Article 321 of the Code of Civil Procedure is closely linked to Article 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which defines the basic elements of the action, which bind the court if it is not modified by the plaintiff³⁵.

The Supreme Court accurately pointed out in the resolution, referred to at the beginning of this work, that “By limiting the court with the scope of the claim

It is worth noting that the institution of an unspecified claim is not known in the Polish law, so that the amount or quantity of the same type of goods identified by the plaintiff always sets the upper limit of the claim, which the court cannot exceed. This also applies to cases in which the court may award an appropriate amount according to its assessment (Article 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure). Cf. allows to maintain the dispute within the legal protection sought by the plaintiff and functions an important guarantee and protection for the other party, ensuring them the right to be heard and adopt adequate defence”.

When considering the context of limiting the court by the scope of the claim, one should also pay attention to the problematic issue of the contradiction between the content of the claim and its justification. In the literature on the subject, it has been pointed out that it is possible either to strictly apply the principle of ne eat iudex ultra petita partium and dismiss the claim, or to violate this principle and ignore the content of the claim by the court in a decision on the claim, regardless of the fact that the plaintiff did not request it, but which stems from the facts referred to by the plaintiff. Between these approaches, there is a solution which necessitates the court first attempts to obtain from the plaintiff the appropriate instructions or even a change of the claim (action); but if the plaintiff still insists on their claim, then the court issues a decision dismissing the action³⁶.

LIMITING THE COURT BY THE CONTENT OF THE CLAIM IN THE CONTEXT OF THE PROHIBITION OF ADJUDICATING MORE THAN IT IS CLAIMED – SELECTED DECISIONS

Limiting the court by the content of the claim in the context of the prohibition of adjudicating more than it is claimed is not new; however, from the perspective of the present legal issue, attention should be paid to the most significant judgements.

The first group concerns judgements in which the Supreme Court took the position that the prohibition of adjudicating more than it is claimed means that the court may not decide on the claim that has not been filed by the plaintiff, in particular, awarding an amount higher than that one requested in the claim, regardless of the fact that undoubtedly it would have been appropriate in the factual circumstances of the case.

In the judgement of 24 January 1936 (C II 1770/35), the Supreme Court took the position that granting the action on the factual basis, which the plaintiff neither in the claim nor in the proceedings before the court of first instance refers to in their claim, is an award higher than the claimed one. Also, in the judgement of 29 October 1999 (I CKN 464/98), the Supreme Court pointed out that the scope of the decision was determined by the scope of the claim. Even if the facts that the plaintiff refer to indicate that they are entitled to another claim in addition to the original one, the court is not allowed to decide on such a claim if it has not been submitted by the party.

³⁶ K. Weitz, op. cit., p. 710.

Similarly, in the judgement of 12 February 2002 (I CKN 902/99) the Supreme Court ruled that the court could not grant something else or more to what was claimed by the plaintiff; neither the court cannot rule on a factual basis of the action other than the one indicated by the plaintiff. However, the court is not limited by the legal basis of the claim and may examine its appropriateness irrespective of whether the possibility of deciding on another substantive legal claim is excluded, as the result of the claim made by the plaintiff and the determination of this claim's factual basis³⁷. The form of the claim regarding the award of a benefit will depend on the will of the party; therefore, the court cannot independently change the type of benefit claimed³⁸.

In subsequent decisions, it was emphasized that the limits of adjudication in accordance with Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure determines the value of claims, but also the subject matter of the claim, determined by its factual basis. In the event of a pecuniary claim, the award of a sum within the limits of the amount of the claim, but on a different factual basis than the one indicated by the plaintiff in the lawsuit and in the course of the proceedings, constitutes a judgement for more than it is claimed³⁹.

Provided that in Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure the limits of judgement have been determined, the court cannot rule on the subject not indicated in the party's claim and more than in the submitted claim⁴⁰. The prohibition on adjudicating more than it is claimed in this provision reflects the rules of availability

³⁹ Judgement of the Supreme Court of 18 March 2005, II CK 556/04. Also in the judgement of 7 November 2007 (II CSK 344/07), the Supreme Court stated that the limits of the claim were determined, among others, by the amount of claims being sought. It means that the court cannot award more than it is claimed, and therefore, allow the claim to be greater than the plaintiff claims, including when the circumstances of the case clearly indicate that the plaintiff is entitled to a larger benefit. See also: judgements of the Supreme Court of: 29 October 1993, I CRN 156/93, unpublished; 7 November 2007, II CSK 344/07, unpublished; 11 December 2008, II CSK 364/08; 21 October 2009, I PK 97/09.

and adversariality. It means that the scope of the judgement, both in a positive and negative sense, is determined by the party's claim. The court may not award a benefit other than that requested by the plaintiff, nor may it award more than the plaintiff claimed, or on a factual basis other than that indicated by the plaintiff. This stance has been adopted in many judgements, in which the Supreme Court expressly emphasizes that in the compensation process, the court is not limited by the method of determining the damage indicated by the injured party, but only by the amount of compensation claimed and the facts that are referred to justify the claim⁴¹. The judgement of the Supreme Court of 10 November 2017⁴² is in the same line. In this judgement, the Supreme Court also ruled that a manifestation of the principles of availability is, i.a., granting the party the right to freely use their procedural rights, including the determination of the scope of legal protection that is being sought. This term is also binding, which means that the court cannot rule on what the party did not claim or go beyond the claim, and thus decide on what the party has not presented in their lawsuit. Similarly, in the judgement of the Supreme Court of 6 September 2017⁴³, it was stated that "The rule of limiting the court with the scope of the claim (ne eat iudex ultra petita partium) that is established in Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure means that the court cannot decide on something more (ultra), anything other than the claim (aliud), and obviously without a formulated claim. The principle of the autonomy of the will of the parties, which results from this provision and according to which a person is free to determine their legal situation and the principle of availability, according to which the parties may freely use their rights and claim them in court or to resign from seeking legal protection, are the guiding principles of the civil action, having the source in its essence"⁴⁴.

The Supreme Court, therefore, indicates that Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure defines the limits of ruling in the lawsuit, in accordance with the basic principle of civil procedure, that is, only claims submitted by the parties can be considered by the court⁴⁵. In the light of this regulation, the court is limited by the claim and its factual basis; however, it is not limited by the legal classification

Cf. judgement of the Supreme Court of 29 November 1949, Wa.C. 163/49, published [...] 1950, no. 3, item 61. The judgement granting the claim on the factual basis, which the plaintiff neither in the claim nor in the proceedings before the court of first instance refer to in their claim, is an award above the claim. provided by the plaintiff. Limited by the claim it may not dispose of the subject of the lawsuit by determining its limits regardless of the scope of the claim for protection specified by the plaintiff⁴⁶. The court adjudicates the entire subject matter of the dispute, as set out by the plaintiff, whereas the judgement whose scope is wider than the one of the claim is a judgement beyond the claim⁴⁷.

Many judgements of common courts can be mentioned here as well. In these judgements, it is clearly indicated that it is the plaintiff who decides about the scope of the claim before the court⁴⁸. The inadmissibility of ruling on an object not covered by the claim means that it is impossible to rule on claims other than the one made by the plaintiff⁴⁹. Therefore, the court cannot change the factual basis of the claim, because “by exceeding its limits and even considering the protection of a legitimate legal interest of the party, it becomes the party’s advocate, depriving the pension authority the possibility of defending its adopted position”⁵⁰.

It is also emphasized that the court cannot award a claim in a higher amount than the one specified by the plaintiff, also when the circumstances of the case clearly indicate that the plaintiff is entitled to a larger benefit⁵¹.

The second group of the Supreme Court’s judgements indicates that no judgement can be made above the claim if the court clarifies the content of the claim – within the limits of the plaintiff’s motivation, or only clarifies the defendant’s specific conduct, regardless of the fact that it is not indicated directly in the lawsuit. In the judgement of 5 July 2018 (II PK 109/17), the Supreme Court pointed out that “If the factual basis of a claim is multifaceted, an in-depth legal analysis of the claim is required, as provided in Article 378 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the same time, this analysis does not mean going beyond the boundaries specified in Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it would not lead to adjudication more than it is claimed and its factual basis contained in the lawsuit”⁵². Therefore, in a situation of vague or even incorrect formulation of the claim, the court may modify it accordingly, in accordance with the will of the plaintiff and within the limits of the factual basis of the lawsuit. This does not preclude the court from specifying in the operative part of judgement within judicial activity the elements that result directly from the justification of the claim and which have been proved by the plaintiff, insofar as it is necessary for the correct construction of the judgement in a way enabling its execution⁵³. Therefore, the clarification by the adjudicating court of the subject of the claim cannot be considered and treated as a manifestation of a violation of the prohibition of adjudicating beyond the claim⁵⁴.

This direction of the Supreme Court's judgements is also present in the case law of common courts, in which it is emphasized that the claim, from both the party and the subject perspective, should be determined in a way that there is no doubt as to what is the subject of the proceedings and against whom the plaintiff claims specific rights⁵⁵. The prohibition of adjudication beyond the claim does not, therefore, mean that the court is strictly limited by the means of its determination. However, allowing the court to intervene in the event of an incorrect or imprecise determination of the claim, it is also pointed out that it cannot be too far-reaching and cannot change the nature of the claim⁵⁶.

The presented views point to a number of exceptions adopted in the jurisprudence practice from the general and essentially unquestioned rule of strictly limiting the court by the literal scope of the claim, which sets the limits of the prohibition of adjudication beyond the claim. The presented achievements of jurisprudence provide numerous examples of departing from restrictive compliance with Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure in order to implement the basic function of a civil trial, that is, to grant appropriate legal protection to the plaintiff if there are grounds for doing so. Although the plaintiff, as the host and initiator of the process, is obliged to define their claim clearly and the court is limited by its scope, there are situations in which the court clarifies the claim independently, but in accordance with the plaintiff's intentions and in order to provide them with due protection; such situations prevail over strict procedural formalism. Also, the Supreme Court rightly stated explaining its stance that “the claim may be interpreted in order to consider the plaintiff’s actual will”, whereas in a doubtful situation, apart from its literal wording, the scope determined by the justification of the claim should be considered. However, in the case of “formulating the claim in a way that raises doubts, the court may modify it accordingly, but it may not award something else (aliud) or more (super), because it is always limited by the plaintiff’s will”.

THE ANALYSIS OF THE ISSUE BY THE AUTHOR

Taking into account the considerations to date regarding the issue of the scope of adjudication in cases of pecuniary compensation for harm suffered, on the one hand, it is indicated that the court only after determining the compensation, if it accepts the cause, it deducts in an appropriate proportion this amount of compensation and the amounts that have already been paid. The award of the amount determined in this way, which falls within the claim made by the plaintiff, cannot lead to the finding that the court has exceeded the limits of the claim. It is emphasized that “The plaintiff’s claim, i.e. the amount of the claim they have indicated, does not have to be the same as the amount that will ultimately be considered appropriate by the court. The court undoubtedly has to adjudicate within the plaintiff’s claim, and cannot make a decision beyond the limits of this claim; however, there is a difference between determining the amount appropriate as compensation and determining the party’s claim in court proceedings and its assessment. At the same time, it would be difficult to expect that the plaintiff, especially when they question their contribution to the damage, considered its degree in the context of the claim, a fortiori and similarly to compensation, determining this degree is the discretion of the judge. In addition, the plaintiff does not need to consider the possibility of recognizing their contribution to the damage, foresee the possibility of reducing the redress sought for this reason already at the stage of bringing an action, or formulate claims in a much higher amount merely considering only procedural reasons, risking that they will have to incur the costs of the trial in the event of dismissal”. When the court does only an accounting operation based on the assumption that the compensation due to the plaintiff is higher than the indicated one in the lawsuit, does not mean that the court ruled above what was claimed⁵⁷.

⁵⁷ See judgement of the Court of Appeal in Lodz of 18 September 2015, I ACa 362/15, LEX no. 1842746; judgement of the Appeal Court in Bialystok of 7 May 2015, I ACa 10/15, LEX no. 1733644; judgement of the Court of Appeal in Warsaw of 21 December 2012, VI ACa 1031/12, LEX no. 1314953; judgement of the Court of Appeal in Warsaw of 20 October 2015, VI ACa 1432/14, LEX no. 1992951.

On the other hand, it should be pointed out that “the formal requirements of the lawsuit (Article 187 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure), a precisely defined claim and a reference the facts justifying it, determine the subject of the court’s examination and decision. The judgement on the claim, as indicated in the claim but submitted to a smaller range than the one justified by the result of the proceedings, is a judgement above what was claimed, contrary to the prohibition set out in Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which refers to both the claim and its factual basis. The court rules on the entire subject matter of the dispute, as it was defined by the plaintiff, and the judgement, which is broader than the scope of the claim, is a judgement beyond the claim. Also, in a situation where the court reduces the amount claimed by the plaintiff, considering that the injured party has contributed to the damage caused, the reduction is made in relation to the amount claimed by the plaintiff unless the factual basis shows that this amount has already included the contribution to the damage caused”⁵⁸.

In Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the rule ne eat iudex ultra petita partium falls under both the prohibition to rule on something more and on something other than it was claimed. This provision can also be used to prohibit the court from adjudicating without a claim. Limiting the court by the scope of the claim is closely linked to the principle of the autonomy of the will, according to which everyone may shape their legal situation independently. Therefore, one may freely use their subjective rights and assert them in court or resign from seeking legal protection. This principle is closely connected with the principle of availability, according to which the parties may freely dispose of the subject of the proceedings.

Therefore, the Supreme Court in its resolution correctly emphasized that the principle of autonomy of will, which is under the substantive law, means that “every person may freely decide on their legal situation by means of legal actions, as well as decides how to exercise their subjective rights and assert their protection in court”. The correlate of this principle is the procedural principle of availability, which means that the parties may freely use the subject of the dispute and their procedural rights. Thus, “the essence of the civil action is the solution, where the parties can determine on their own the framework of the dispute and thus set the limits of adjudication”⁵⁹.

The purpose of monetary compensation is to award the injured party an adequate sum of money for the harm they have suffered. The award of compensation, as envisaged by the legislator, must be “appropriate”, which means that the courts deciding on this matter, in principle, have the freedom to determine the amount of compensation due. Therefore, the freedom granted to courts in determining the amount of compensation due is thus enabling the implementation of the compensation function to its most possible extent⁶⁰. Of course, as the Supreme Court accurately indicates, “a person who intends to seek monetary compensation for non-pecuniary damage in the form of negative psychological experiences or moral harm, must, before bringing an action, ‘assess’ its scope, anticipating the future position of the court and possible statements of the defendant”. At the same time, the Supreme Court rightly questions “whether the plaintiff should claim the full and final amount of compensation. If the answer were affirmative, the submitted claim would not correspond to the expected resolution, assuming that the claim will be dismissed in part, incurring higher court fees and legal representation costs, and would unnecessarily involve the other party and the court in a dispute that does not actually exist. The court, when issuing the decision, would then consider the amount claimed as a starting point and the basis for making appropriate reductions for ‘inadequate’ compensation and in consideration of the statement of the injured party’s contribution. Such a solution not only has no basis in procedural law but would also lead to a violation of the principle of rational operation and procedural economy”.

It is thus necessary to state that in the proceeding for compensation, the court does not have to follow the method of calculating the compensation indicated by the injured party, but only the amount of the claimed compensation and the factual circumstances that are referred to justify the claim. Thus, the prohibition to adjudicate above what is claimed sufficiently satisfies the rules of availability and adversariality⁶¹.

Undoubtedly, the harm suffered as a result of the death of a close relative is very difficult to assess and express in a monetary form. Each case should be treated individually, considering all the circumstances of the case. According to the consolidated view of the case law, the adjustment of the amount of compensation awarded by the court of appeal is justified only if, considering all the circumstances of the case affecting its level, it is disproportionately inappropriate, either excessively high or abnormally low⁶².

⁶¹ Judgement of the Supreme Court of 5 December 2008, III CSK 228/08.

The jurisprudence has indicated that compensation, being a form of monetary compensation for non-pecuniary damage, must be “appropriate” to the harm suffered, which is determined considering the overall circumstances of the case, in particular, the extent of physical and mental suffering and the effects of damage to health in the future. The set of these circumstances constitutes the factual basis for determining the compensation, both when specifying the claim by the injured party and when making the decision⁶³.

It should be also noted that in many cases, the basic factor determining the amount of compensation is, in fact, the amount of the claim submitted by the plaintiff. The courts sometimes explicitly state that “there were actual grounds to consider a slightly higher amount” for compensation, which, however, could not be specified because of the prohibition of adjudication above what was claimed⁶⁴.

The Supreme Court accurately accepted the position that the plaintiff claiming an award of a lower amount than the amount that would compensate for the entire non-pecuniary damage, should each time extend the factual basis of the action by explaining directly or indirectly the method of calculating compensation, state that they are entitled to a claim for satisfaction of the damage in a higher extent and give reasons for its limitation. It was also emphasized that “The limits of the subject of the dispute determined by the claim and such justification of the claim constitute the basis for adjudication and enable the court to consider the statements and limitations, respectively, or if they are found to be unfounded or insufficient, to omit and assess the merits of the action using the conditions specified in Article 446 § 4 and Article 362 of the Civil Code resulting in an ‘adequate’ reduction of the amount claimed”. At the same time, it was accepted that the plaintiff may change the subject matter in the course of the proceedings within the limits set by procedural law. It was accurately concluded that “Establishing the court’s decision on such a factual basis of the lawsuit in this sense does not violate the principles of availability and adversariality and enables the defendant to form a defence”.

The prohibition of adjudicating above what is claimed by the court is not only an expression of the fact that the parties as the hosts and holders of the proceedings (domini litis) decide about the extent to which the judge, by exercising their judicial power, can settle a dispute, but also that the parties who are entities interested in the outcome of the proceedings are responsible for asserting their rights. The plaintiff cannot count on the court to rule on their rights in a different scope than the one resulting from their claim. In this way, the hallmarks of the availability principle and the associated adversariality principle are emphasized; these principles confirm the parties' freedom of action in the civil action, and are also based on the assumption of responsibility for their actions⁶⁵. This is related to the thesis that the essence of the civil action is the solution, where the parties can determine on their own framework of the dispute and thus set the limits of adjudication⁶⁶.

However, the significance and importance of the ne eat iudex ultra petita partium principle is determined not only by its relations to the principle of availability and, through it, by the principle of the autonomy of the will of private law entities, but also by the important guarantee and protective function of the prohibition of adjudication above what is claimed. Limiting the authority of the court by authorizing it to decide only about what is the subject of the dispute, and making this authority dependent on the will of the parties also serves to protect the citizen against violation of their rights by means of a court decision or even against judicial "arbitrariness"; the judge may decide only on what is claimed, and not, at its option, any claim⁶⁷.

The principle of ne eat iudex ultra petita partium means that the court may decide only on what is claimed submitted by the party requesting legal protection. The scope of the requested legal protection thus sets the boundaries of the subject of the decision⁶⁸. At the same time, the assumption that there should be complete agreement between the subject of the proceedings and the subject of the ruling, i.e. what covers the subject of the decision, should be considered correct⁶⁹. As a result, it must be recognized that there are a close relationship and interdependence between limiting the court with what is claimed and the subject matter of the dispute. In determining the claim, the plaintiff thus sets the boundaries of the subject of the dispute, and limiting the court with what is claimed is tantamount to limiting the subject of the dispute⁷⁰.

The comparison of Article 187 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure (the necessity to specify precisely the claim and refer to the facts that justify it by the plaintiff in the lawsuit) and Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure (prohibition of ruling on the subject that is not claimed, and awarding above what is claimed) allows to give priority to Article 187 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure and assume that the boundaries of the subject of the dispute are determined not only by the claim (its content) but also by its factual basis understood as the factual circumstances relied on to justify the claim for a specific content of the judgement. As a result, a request within the meaning of Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure it should be determined not only by reference to its content but also to the facts relied on to justify it⁷¹.

To determine the limits within which the court may decide, it is important to determine what the plaintiff is actually claiming, which is not always possible only on the basis of the wording of the claim. In practice, the problem of its interpretation arises when the plaintiff has formulated it not precisely enough, and there is no basis to consider it as non-compliance with the formal conditions of the lawsuit (Article 130 § 1 and Article 187 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure).

The doctrine and case law are in agreement that the claim made by the plaintiff may, if necessary, be an interpreter with the aim to ensure that the decision has its subject that corresponds with the plaintiff's actual claim⁷². The decisive meaning may not be the literal wording of the claim itself, but the plaintiff's will expressed in it to obtain from the court a ruling which will have specific legal outcomes. The interpretation of the claim should consider not only its content (its conclusion) but also its factual justification provided by the plaintiff⁷³. It is related to the assumption that the limits within which the court may decide (Article 321 § 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure) are determined not only by the content of the claim but also by its factual basis. In addition, the court, when attempting to determine the correct content of the plaintiff's claim, may also use the method of asking questions to interpret it⁷⁴. As a result, limiting the court with what is claimed does not mean that the court is simply limited by the wording of the claim, but by what constitutes the plaintiff's will. Therefore, it is not the case that the court must reflect the literal wording of the claim in its judgement, but may, if necessary and in accordance with the outcomes of the interpretation of the claim, modify the wording in the operative part of the judgement in such a way to express the plaintiff's will in the claim's content in the correct judicial form⁷⁵. Naturally, all interpretative measures must not lead to the court changing the actual content of the plaintiff's claim and deciding on something more than the plaintiff (plus) claimed, or something that the plaintiff did not claim (aliud)⁷⁶. In practice, this issue must be assessed ad casu, because only when considering the background of the circumstances of the specific case, it can be determined whether the court merely specified in the judgement the plaintiff's claim or replace it with something that the plaintiff did not claim at all.

STRESZCZENIE

Celem niniejszego opracowania jest analiza zagadnień prawnych związanych z zakresem orzekania w sprawach o zadośćuczynienie pieniężne za doznaną krzywdę, zwłaszcza w sytuacji, w której strona podniosła zarzut przyczynienia się poszkodowanego do powstania szkody, a żądanie zgłoszone w pozwie obejmowało kwotę niższą od potencjalnie „odpowiedniego zadośćuczynienia”. Obowiązanie zasady ne eat iudex ultra petita partium oznacza, że sąd może orzec wyłącznie o tym, co zostało objęte żądaniem przedstawionym przez podmiot występujący z wnioskiem o udzielenie ochrony prawnej. Niniejsza analiza prowadzi do wniosku, że zakres żądanej ochrony prawnej wyznacza granice przedmiotu rozstrzygnięcia. Jednocześnie za prawidłowe należy uznać założenie, że powinna istnieć całkowita zgodność między przedmiotem procesu a przedmiotem orzekania, tj. tym, co obejmuje przedmiot rozstrzygnięcia. W rezultacie należy stwierdzić, że istnieje ścisły związek i współzależność pomiędzy związaniem sądu granicami żądania a problematyką przedmiotu sporu. Określając żądanie, powód wyznacza więc granice przedmiotu sporu, a związanie sądu przedstawionym żądaniem jest równoznaczne ze związaniem przedmiotem sporu.
